new member, gave fans something special to cheer about as she brandished her flower-adorned bass. She was born in Argentina, one-upping the Butler boys.

“Ole, ole ole ole. Ole, ole ole ole. Chr-is Cor-nell,” repeated Argentines, serenading Soundgarden with their revered—yet slightly modified—soccer chant in appreciation of the band’s first visit to Buenos Aires.

The Red Hot Chili Peppers capped the festival by pouring gasoline on an already flaming crowd, which grew to 130,000 combining both mid-week days. Drifting away from the front of the stage to take in the whole picture revealed the massive sea of people that extended all the way to the second main stage.

“Lollapalooza is a beautiful thing,” said Anthony Kiedis, before singing “Give It Away” to close the show. Chad Smith, draped in an Argentine flag, handed his drumsticks to fans as Flea gave a heartfelt farewell, “Muchas gracias, Buenos Aires. Mucho amor.”

Lollapalooza has spread way, way south—starting with Chile in 2011 and Brazil in 2012—and debuted earlier this year in Argentina, a country well known for Evita, tango and soccer.

The festival’s first day also showcased Cage The Elephant, Phoenix, Nine Inch Nails and New Order. Then on Wednesday, the beaming Perry and beautiful Etty Lau Farrell collaborated with French electronic artist Joachim Garraud and performed their new song “Everybody.”

Paz Lenchantin, the Pixies’ new member, gave fans something special to cheer about as she brandished her flower-adorned bass. She was born in Argentina, one-upping the Butler boys.

“Ole, ole ole ole. Ole, ole ole ole. Chr-is Cor-nell,” repeated Argentines, serenading Soundgarden with their revered—yet slightly modified—soccer chant in appreciation of the band’s first visit to Buenos Aires.

Later during the two-day festival, a cheeky fan waved a sign: “Subtítulos [subtitles].” But judging by how much the crowds sang along, there seemed to be little communication gap. The performers helped matters by playing many fan favorites.

Fifty bands hit four giant stages spread across the Hipódromo de San Isidro, an immense horse racetrack. Each day started with Argentine groups, such as songstress Juana Molina and drum troupe La Bomba de Tiempo, both from Buenos Aires, and urban rockers El Mató a un Policía Motorizado, from neighboring La Plata. As the days progressed, Spanish eased into English.

By the end of the second day, the crowd, which grew to 130,000 combining both mid-week days. Drifting away from the front of the stage to take in the whole picture revealed the massive sea of people that extended all the way to the second main stage.

“Lollapalooza is a beautiful thing,” said Anthony Kiedis, before singing “Give It Away” to close the show. Chad Smith, draped in an Argentine flag, handed his drumsticks to fans as Flea gave a heartfelt farewell, “Muchas gracias, Buenos Aires. Mucho amor.”

Dan Linehan